

This image makes up a clickable navigation menu.

You can view a PRINTER FRIENDLY version of this article here.

Susan Sontag's Readers Respond, Remember, Re-read :: James Naremore

14 February 2005

Editor:
Colin Burnett

Select a contributor

- Melissa Anderson
- Dudley Andrew
- Jean Bruce
- Marcie Frank
- E. Ann Kaplan
- John Locke
- Adrian Martin
- James Naremore
- Carl Rollyson
- Jonathan Rosenbaum
- Robert Sklar
- Greg Taylor
- Jerry White

Comments?
Questions?
Click here
to go to our Contact form.

Click to subscribe to our mailing list.

Click here
to visit our archives.

Click here for A "Sontag on Film" Bibliography and Filmography

In the two decades before her death, Susan Sontag appeared to lose interest in the cinema, although she had briefly been a film maker herself. She seldom wrote about contemporary directors, and in one of her essays she went so far as to argue that the age of cinephilia had ended. The turning point in her career may have been On Photography, which manifests a great deal of ambivalence about photographic images, and which adopts a somewhat moralistic tone. (This was also about the time when Sontag began to define herself as a novelist rather than an essayist.) At any rate, the book on photography is in sharp contrast with her important early essays on movies in Against Interpretation. To borrow the Arnoldian terminology of her famous essay on camp, we might say that the late writing on photography is Hebraic, whereas the early writing on film is Hellenic. For me, Sontag was at her best in the latter mode, when she was writing about the cultural implications of the sensuous qualities of movies. Whether in her superb commentaries on Bergman and Godard or in her brilliant anatomy of the fascist aesthetic in Riefenstahl, she was both a gifted stylist and an intense intellectual pleasure. In retrospect, her essays on camp and on science fiction pictures are important signposts of cultural history—a kind of riposte to Clement Greenberg's austere modernism. Nevertheless, Sontag was also a modernist, and an extremely important writer on continental literature and theory. One of the major critics of the twentieth century, she will be read far into the future.

James Naremore is Chancellors' Professor of Communication and Culture at Indiana University. He is the author of "Acting in the Cinema" (University of California Press, 1990), "More than Night: Film Noir in its Contexts" (University of California Press, 1998), and, most recently, editor of "Film Adaptation" (Rutgers University Press, 2000).

<http://articles.synoptique.ca/naremore/>

<<< :: Previous entry
Susan Sontag's Readers Respond, Remember, Re-read

Next entry :: >>>
Susan Sontag's Readers Respond, Remember, Re-read

[Back to Top]

ISSN 1715-7641

Copyright © 2004-2005 Synoptique and its respective authors. All rights reserved.
Reproductions of any portion of this website only with the expressed permission of Synoptique and its respective authors.

* * *

